First and foremost, I must express my gratitude to the school and its management for providing the necessary support and assistance to a disabled girl like me. Their responsibility towards accommodating and caring for students with disabilities is evident, and I appreciate their efforts. However, I cannot deny that my experience during those three years left me feeling disconnected from that school. It seemed like they didn't fully understand or consider my unique situation. Their actions and words often caused me pain and discomfort.

Moreover, I observed that some students in the school displayed behaviors and attitudes that were far beyond their age not with me but themselves. There were instances of students engaging in activities such as smoking, drinking, consuming gutka, and watching adult movies. It was as if they were living a life beyond their years. Looking back, it's somewhat amusing, but at that time, I was naive and unaware of what was happening around me. It could have been the case in any school, but for me, it was a new and unfamiliar environment.

Furthermore, I noticed that there was a significant issue of language discrimination in my school. There seemed to be a distinction made between Tamil and Telugu students, and I couldn't shake off the feeling of being treated differently based on language. While it's possible that my perception could be subjective, I experienced this sentiment on numerous occasions.

It's important to acknowledge that despite the accomplishments and progress made by girls, we are not exempt from imperfections. Each individual's experiences and actions should be considered on their own merit.

“VBM school taught me to be aware of and learn about everything good and bad around me, but not to become addicted to anything.”
